Dear Colleagues,

Self Psychology in a Multidisciplinary World: Expansiveness and Constraints, our 38th Annual Conference of The Psychology of the Self, explores ways in which Self Psychology is augmented by insights drawn from other disciplines to meet challenges and maximize benefits in our current psychoanalytic milieu. To do justice to this variety, we have opted to present a number of shorter panels, each followed by a panel discussion organized by contemporary self psychology leaders to which attendees will “belong” throughout. The conference begins with a Keynote by Robert Stolorow, titled “A Phenomenological-contextual, Existential and Ethical Perspective on Emotional Trauma”.

Panel One, titled “We'll Improvise”, presents current ideas regarding the spontaneous generation of “improvisational moments” in treatment, demonstrating how the complexity of the field momentarily shifts from the more ordinary, asymmetrical relationship into a more symmetrical relationship in which both participants co-create a critical narrative that neither could have created alone.

Panel Two, titled “History Flows Through Us”, exploring history’s role in psychological experience, and offers two presentations, one focused on how history impacts our understanding of ourselves, our perception of others, and our choice of theory, and the other focused on the impact of the Holocaust on our theories, particularly on how Heinz Kohut’s struggle with his own Holocaust trauma may influence self psychology today.

Panel Three, titled “Sexuality within the Clinical Relationship,” explores how in the clinical process patient and analyst must answer the question that emerges implicitly or explicitly, “Why can’t we be lovers?”

Panel Four, titled “Making Ourselves Up”, examines the stories created in the clinical setting. The process of making stories is inherent in living in the world, in creating relationships, and in practicing psychoanalysis, and these stories are inevitably fictional.

Panel Five, titled “On MindBrainBody”, explores the necessary interdigitation of mindbrainbody in more fully understanding the therapeutic dyad in interaction. While one presentation will focus on brain, and the other on body, it is the whole of mindbrainbody that is at the center of psychoanalytic concern.

Panel Six, titled “Multidisciplinary Knowing: Commensurability and Incommensurability Among Theories and Persons”, explores important questions raised by self psychology’s inquiry into other disciplines interested in human subjectivity as sources of distinct and useful knowledge. Panelists ask, among other questions, is commensurability necessary for integration? Is incommensurability a constraint?

Tessa Phillips is the Kohut Memorial Lecturer, and the title of her paper is “Race, Place and Self”. The conference will end directly after the closing Panel, with a conversation with Donna Orange and the audience on the clinical and philosophical implications of the Conference as a whole.

By the close of this conference, the learner will be able to:

1. Address the question of whether, within the interdisciplinary world of self psychology, there must be commensurability between and among scientific disciplines, providing an illustration of an instance of integration of self psychology with brain research, somatic expression, literary studies, or historic research.
2. Describe whether narratives derived from therapy are factual, and if not factual, say in what sense they are true.
3. Explain how we distinguish brain and mind, and body and mind.
4. Outline the way in which the child develops an ability to tell a story.
5. Describe and give an illustration of an improvisational moment, and explain how it is distinguished from an interpretation and response.
